It was an eventful race for the gold for both the men and women at the 2013 U.S. Figure Skating Championships in Omaha, Neb. The men saw a first-time winner as Max Aaron, 20, pieced together a beautiful free skate to jump to the top of the leaderboard. Meanwhile, Ashley Wagner defended her title on the women's side, but her free skate was not nearly as flawless. Wagner joined some nice company by picking up her second-straight gold at this event. U.S. Figure Skating tweeted this impressive tidbit Events like parties and weddings aren't a physical place; they're really just a gathering of people based on an idea. So it's "at" for those sentences. If you heard someone say "She was in the wedding", it would mean she was a participant, like a bridesmaid. It's similar to "I saw him in a play": it would mean the speaker saw an actor performing in a play. "I saw her at the theater" and "in the theater" can both be correct. I'd normally say "at" but if it was important to say that she was inside of the building Performers who confirmed an appearance faced widespread scrutiny, and several who had been even loosely associated with the event backed away from the plans. Last week, Mr. Trump's committee announced a lineup of performers for an additional event, the "Make America Great Again! Welcome Celebration," which will take place on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial the day before the inauguration and be free and open to the public. With plans shifting and tweets flying, it has been hard to keep track of who is performing and who has distanced themselves from the inauguration. Here's a rundown of who
